CANTERLOT BOUTIQUE

Premise by Meghan McCarthy

Rarity is finally fulfilling her dream of having a boutique in Canterlot and asks Princess Twilight if she would mind modeling one of her latest creations at the grand opening. Her stamp of approval on one of Rarity's dresses will certainly get everypony in Canterlot talking. Princess Twilight happily agrees to do this favor for her friend and the results are fantastic. After seeing a princess in one of Rarity's dresses, everypony in Canterlot wants to get an outfit from Rarity's boutique. The only problem is that they all want the exact same dress Princess Twilight was wearing. Rarity is soon producing identical dresses at breakneck speed to keep up with demand. Her boutique is a huge success, but Rarity soon realizes that it comes at a cost. She's so busy making the one outfit that she doesn't have time to work on any new designs. Plus, she's churning out so many of the "Princess Dresses" to keep up with demand that their quality isn't living up to her high standards. Rarity may have the most successful shop in Canterlot, but it isn't making her as happy as she thought it would. Ultimately, Rarity realizes that while it might mean her boutique won't be the most popular shop in town, discontinuing the Princess Twilight dress and focusing her creative efforts on the one-of-a-kind pieces she loves to make will be far more satisfying. Success isn't measured by how many ponies appreciate her designs but how much satisfaction she gets from designing them.
