APPLE PIE FAMILY HOLIDAY

Premise by Meghan McCarthy

It's never been determined for sure if the Apples and the Pies are distant cousins, but Applejack and Pinkie Pie agree that it is high time they got their potentially related families together. And what better time than Hearth's Warming Eve? The Apples excitedly head to the Pie's Rock Farm where Apple Bloom immediately hits it off with Pinkie Pie's youngest sister, the nebbish Marble Pie. But as the two families carry out their Hearth's Warming Eve traditions, they realize that they celebrate in very different ways. Neither side can make heads-or-tails of why the other side is doing what they are doing to celebrate, but both are certain that their holiday traditions are the best. Surely the other family would have an even better Hearth's Warming Eve if they adopted their way of doing things. Unfortunately, rather than convincing the other family that their traditions are superior, they both end up offending each other. Hearth's Warming Eve is ruined and neither family wants to see each other ever again! Ultimately, it is Apple Bloom and Marble Pie who help their respective families see that while they may have different ways of celebrating Hearth's Warming Eve, what truly makes the holiday special is the way it brings families together. In the end, the Apples and Pies carry out their own unique traditions, and Apple Bloom and Marble Pie introduce a new tradition that the two families can share.
