Rainbow Confession

Premise by M.A. Larson

Twilight Sparkle, Fluttershy, Pinkie Pie, and Applejack are away on a girls' weekend to the Crystal Empire. Rarity can't go because she's simply too busy (she's been on a hot streak lately, taking orders from all sorts of trendsetters and celebrities). And Rainbow Dash has to stay behind for Wonderbolt Reserves training. Calamity strikes when Rarity discovers that Rainbow Dash has been locked up in the Canterlot brig and is facing a court martial!

She races to Canterlot, where she learns that Rainbow Dash has been accused of sabotaging one of the Wonderbolts so she would be called up from the reserves. To make matters worse, there is overwhelming evidence against her. No pony believes in her innocence... except Rarity.

At first, the situation looks dire for Rainbow Dash. Rarity is a horrible lawyer (though she looks fabulous in her business suit). But as the case progresses, the desire to clear her friend's name brings out street smarts and legal savvy she never realized she had. Through Rarity's faith in Rainbow Dash, and Rainbow Dash's faith in Rarity, they win the case (it turns out Lightning Dust was the saboteur and framed Rainbow Dash) and Rainbow Dash is reinstated, proving that even when things look dim, you should always have faith in your friends. Rarity has had to sacrifice many of her most promising accounts to devote her time to her friend's case, but in the end she so impresses the Wonderbolts that they ask her to design their new performance gear.
