THEME: Sometimes even longtime friends need to work on communication, because true friendship means understanding and respecting everypony’s perspective.

Pinkie Pie, Rarity, and Applejack return home from a boat trip all looking disheveled and angry. When everyone asks what happened, none of them want to talk about it and march off in separate directions. Twilight decides to get to the bottom of it and interviews each of the upset friends in their individual homes. She soon discovers they each have a slightly different story about the experience. From Pinkie’s point of view, Applejack and Rarity capsized the boat and landed them stranded on a deserted island, but when she tried to cheer her friends up with a party, the other two couldn’t have cared less. According to Applejack the canoe tipped over because of Rarity and Pinkie, and when she tried her hardest to get them off of the island, the other two were too distracted with parties and decorations to help. Rarity explains that, once Pinkie and Applejack sunk their boat and put them on the island, her efforts to collect supplies went completely unappreciated by the others. Twilight listens to each of the three friends’ versions of the events and begins to get a picture off what actually happened. As Princess of Friendship she “commands” them to come to the castle, then makes a joke about the fact that she can’t really make them do anything. She does, however, believe that she can help them all work this thing out. At the castle she pieces the three stories together, like a detective, to reveal that none of them were at fault for the boat capsizing and that the work each of them did on the island contributed to their coming home. Realizing they each only had a part of the whole story, the three friends apologize and lead an expedition back to the island for a party.
