ENOUGH FOR FLUTTER

Premise by Dave Rapp

Rainbow Dash discovers that Fluttershy and her family have been trying to decide where to go on vacation since the early days of the show. She visits them in Cloudsdale and tries to spur them into a decision, but they're all so meek and deferential to each other's feelings that they just whisper endlessly in circles. Dash takes the reins herself and signs them all up for a cruise, but when she sees the Flutters off at the dock and they're already overwhelmed at all the options on the ship's itinerary, she decides she'd better go along and help (i.e., make all the decisions for them).

On the cruise, Fluttershy's family seems relieved to have Rainbow Dash taking the reins. They act delighted by the games, meals and tourist activities Dash chooses, but Fluttershy can see that they're deferring to Dash the way they normally would to each other. When Fluttershy tries to explain this to Dash and get her to deliberate on options that appeal to everyone in the group, Dash makes a string of spontaneous, overconfident decisions that end up with the whole family literally missing the boat and getting abandoned on a tropical island.

Fluttershy is upset and tries to make Dash understand how the Flutter family works – it's not important to them what they do; the main thing is that they do it together. They would be perfectly happy sitting on the deck of the ship all day trying to decide what to do because they'd be sharing each other's company. A pony-of-action like Dash has a hard time getting her head around this; she tells Fluttershy she just wanted to help them all come to a decision about something. Fluttershy is embarrassed to confesses that Dash succeeded—they've all decided that she probably shouldn't be on vacation with them anymore. Taken aback at first, Dash admits she might have been a bit overbearing, but quickly recovers and flies off feeling just as awesome as ever, having totally accomplished her goal.
